

Keeping our classroom safe for people with allergies

Allergies are very common and can range from mild to severe. Those with severe allergies require medical assistance very quickly, as their reactions can be life-threatening. This is why it's so important to keep our classroom as safe as possible for people with allergies.

You can work together to achieve this by:

Never eating food in the classroom, unless you have permission from a teacher

Washing your hands thoroughly after eating

Knowing the signs and symptoms of an allergic reaction

Seeking help immediately from a staff member if you think someone is having an allergic reaction

Understanding the allergies that people have and supporting them to stay safe

Wiping down surfaces and cleaning equipment carefully when instructed to do so

Never making someone feel uncomfortable for having an allergy and never doing something that could increase their risk of having a reaction

REMEMBER

It is important to follow these steps and ensure that those with allergies feel safe and supported while using our classroom.
